Observe on a job or doing job tasks If a person has some job experience whether in-school, within an agency, or community volunteer work it is important to observe how this person functions, i.e. how tasks were learned and are completed, what happens during down-time, speed, accuracy, etc. It is also very important to observe how this person fits into the environment to determine if that work culture matches personality.
☐ Interview professionals (aides, case managers, teachers, etc.)
Those people who spend much time with a person have helpful information about consistency of behaviors, triggers of positive and negative behaviors, personality traits and quirks, and a general history. If you are just meeting a jobseeker or have not known him or her for very long, the behaviors may be different for you; it is important to know what occurs over time.
Interview family and friends
For the same reason you interview professionals, family and friends have even that much more information. Keep in mind during interviews of key stakeholders that you are recording PERSPECTIVES of facts and to always balance this information with your own actual observations and experiences.
☐ Observe at home
People act differently in different environments. Getting an idea of behavior trends at home provides you with insight into family dynamics that may be helpful while working through job interviews and work schedules with this person.
Standardized tests
This type of assessment can gain useful information, especially about career interests. Keep in mind that not everyone is actually successful with standardized test taking, and make sure you are aware of all the supports that need to be provided for someone – such as having questions and answers read or even rephrased for someone, using pictures instead of words, and separating the test out into sections over time.

•	nents – we all do! We act differently on a Saturday night out with friends than we do at work on Monday morning. Because the jobseeker will be inding a job out in the community, it is important to observe behaviors and skills that occur outside of school /agency and home. It is amazing what you will see people do out in the world that they wouldn't even attempt – whether it is because they don't need to or are not encouraged to –in the protected world of school, special education, and adult service agencies.)
Mode simulations
☐ Work simulations
Although it is often difficult for people with Intellectual Disabilities to transfer skills they learn in one environment to another, it is still helpful to get a basic skill baseline, even if in a simulated setting. If you are at least aware of what someon	e is capable of doing in one environment, you have a better chance of creating a different way t
